In one sense, the central character in this drama is the lamb. The lamb gives its life. The lamb is the meal. The blood of the lamb is the means of rescue. As such, the lamb is a potent symbol that points to Jesus Christ, the Lamb of God himself. (Note how Lamb of God is uppercase in the second half of the hymn, stanzas 4â€“6.)

So we see He is not merely the Lamb because He died on the Cross, but He died upon the Cross because He is the Lamb. Let us ever see this disposition in the Blood. Let every mention of the Blood call to mind the deep humility and self-surrender of the Lamb, for it is this disposition that gives the Blood its wonderful power with God.

The blood of the Passover lamb represented the real thing: the divine blood that once had been in Adam and Eve. The devil couldn't have destroyed it; only when Adam and Eve gave over to the devil was the blood rendered powerless to work for them any longer. God had made man and woman free moral agents, free to obey or disobey God.

While The Blood of the Lamb does have its share of funny moments, this is definitely not one of Peter De Vries's comic novels. There is something Job-like about Don Wanderhope, who wanders through life hoping, in spite of the many losses that befall him. Wanderhope is a good man who seeks God; he doesn't have an evil bone in his body.

The blood of the slain lamb was to be applied around the door frame (see Exodus 12:7, 22). This means there was blood above the door, on each side of the door, and at the base of the door, reminding us of the sacrifice of Jesus on the cross. God had promised the Israelites, "When I see the blood, I will pass over you" (verse 13).
