The Congo that Tim Butcher depicts has a painful, difficult and tortured reality, both past and present. Blood River raises more questions than answers, including a seemingly simplistic irony, "Why are the Africans so bad at running Africa?" - a paradox that indirectly sheds light upon the harsher reality: few in the rest of the world seem to ...

A somber, eye-opening journey into the definitive heart of darkness. Joseph Conrad is the tutelary spirit of this work by Daily Telegraph correspondent Butcher, who for years "had stared at maps dominated by the Congo River, a silver-bladed sickle, its handle anchored on the coasts, its tip buried deep in the equatorial forest" and, emphatically without the approval of his newspaper ...
